We say NO to Euro-union!

As the headline in the* Daily Mail graph *of November 21st (on right) shows, the Prime Minister has refused to agree to put the issue of European political unity and a single European currency to a referendum of the British people. This is because he knows that the people, if given a choice, would not support further concessions of national sovereignty to Europe. The Government — which claims to stand for 'democracy' — is in fact running scared of its own people!

Tories deny Labour claim of U-turn over Europe

NO REFERENDUM NOW SAYS MAJOR

By JOHN DEANS, Political Correspondent

THE Prime Minister made it quite clear last night that there will be no referendum on next month's historic Maastricht negotiations.

Despite calls for a referendum on Britain and Europe from all quarters — including his predecessor Margaret Thatcher — Downing Street said it must be for Parliament and Parliament alone to ratify any agreement Mr Major reached on European political unity and a single currency.

On the first day of a two-day Commons debate on Europe, the referendum idea produced the almost unthinkable alliance of Mr Anthony Wedgwood Benn and Mrs Thatcher, both fervent Euro-sceptics.

Mrs Thatcher did not go all the way with Mr Norman Tebbit, who wants a referendum now. She qualified her call for a 'people's vote' on whether Britain should abandon the pound for a European currency by saying it should happen only if all three main political parties were in favour of such a move.

That is unlikely to happen before 1996, and Downing Street made it absolutely clear last night that it would be up to a new Parliament, produced at next year's general election, to decide on the currency issue. That Parliament could, if it wished, call a referendum first.

'But it's a long way away and much would depend on the atmosphere of the time and the country's general view of the Community then,' said one Downing Street insider.

The Number Ten press department was obviously trying to dissociate itself, gently but firmly, from Mrs Thatcher's call. But in its eagerness to do this swiftly, it ended by making a serious gaffe.

The insistence that Mr Major could not rule out — or in — anything during the next Parliament, while it is constitutionally correct, sounded as though the Prime Minister could be making a U-turn. This rumour swept back to the House and triumphant Labour members claimed that Mr

Maggie weaves that old magic

By GORDON GREIG

MARGARET THATCHER came back to the Commons yesterday to give the spark of life to the issue that led to her own career being switched off.

Almost every day this week marks an anniversary of the moment when the life-support system of so much of the Conservative Party's raison d'etre was abruptly closed down.

Yesterday, for instance, marked the moment she won but then lost that first leadership ballot. Today, a year ago, she knew the game was up with her own party. The rumour was that she was still totally depressed by her rejection. But within a minute of getting to her feet she was bang on form again.

Dressed in her familiar black suit with wide white lapels, she was greeted with the cry, 'Here comes the black widow.'

We all knew roughly what she was going to say. But so few people have the power and magic to lift the Commons out of the yawning plod that passes for debate that her appearance is now an event. The sense of electricity is there even when she doesn't speak.

There is only one Thatcher and the mould has surely been broken. On one side, is a successor almost frightened of the power of words. On the other, a party leader who doesn't know when to stop spraying them like a hyperactive lawn sprinkler to drown all logic or meaning.

At the end they were on their feet

STOP THE SELL-OUT — JOIN THE FIGHT FOR BRITAIN'S FREEDOM!

GRADUALLY, SUBTLY AND INEXORABLY, the politicians of Westminster, with the Tory Government of John Major in the lead, are steering Britain and her people towards European Union — a union under which the national freedom for which millions of Britons of many generations have fought and died will be thrown away.

And as they are doing this these same politicians are trying to fob the people off by a series of denials, diversions and evasions, all employed to throw up a smokescreen behind which they hope they will be able to get away with their treachery before the British public fully wakes up to what is happening.

In recent weeks there has been a growing demand for a national referendum on the issues of European political Union and a common European currency. Mr. Major has refused this demand, claiming that, as the people have elected parliament, parliament is entitled to speak and act on behalf of the nation over Europe. If the people want to vote against European Union, Mr. Major says, they will have the chance to do so at the 1992 general election.

There is only one little snag about that: of the three leading political parties of Westminster, ALL are in favour of European Union!

So how can the British people oppose the surrender of our national freedom to Europe?

There is only way — they can support the only serious political movement fighting the next election that is firmly and unequivocally opposed to European Union: the British National Party.

The BNP is not yet strong enough to win a election and stop the process of surrender to Europe. But if people who are against this surrender join it, support it and vote for it they can help build it up into a great national force which, in a few years, will be able to reverse that surrender by taking Britain out of European Union.

This is the only alternative to national extinction.

BRITAIN IN DECAY

BRITAIN today is a picture of decay.

The whole physical aspect of this country now gives the appearance of a land rotting away.

Look at the state of our railways and you see why people don't exactly rush to use them. Trains are dirty, wildly unpunctual and unreliable. As likely as not, especially on suburban networks and London's Tube, their bodywork, inside and out, is criss-crossed in ghetto-style paint-spray graffiti.

The tube system has become positively dangerous. In part, as on British Rail, a type of staff are being recruited who couldn't give a damn. Hence perhaps the rubbish pile underneath the escalators that caused the Kings Cross fire — and all this on top of the crime epidemic that has made parts of the capital's underground network a dangerous jungle.

Nobody, even workers and managers of good will, seems capable of anything better than a helpless shrug of the shoulders in face of it all.

The same story is repeated in one form or another right the way across the nation's life — from the collapsing health service — unable to offer some of those in pain anything better than a forlorn hope of treatment in some uncertain future — to the state of our towns and cities, probably the seediest and most down-at-heel in Europe.

All this has been allowed to become so much the norm that it has come to seem unstoppable. In fact it is no such thing.

Other European countries often have much higher standards, and Britain itself was not always as squalid and inefficient as it is today.

In fact the only thing that makes the decay unstoppable, and prevents it being reversed, is the simple absence, under our way of doing things, of a place for anyone at any level with the authority to cry: "Halt! About turn!"

Britons have allowed themselves to be persuaded for too long that there is some sort of virtue in national indiscipline. The result has been the growth in the national life of an unfettered régime of unco-ordinated "do-as-you-like" and letting things slide.

Mrs. Thatcher, under whose reign our national chaos become even worse than previously, proclaimed this madness in its starkest form when she said that there was "no such thing as society, only individuals." One of her favourite hurrah words was 'freedom', and the latter's monuments can be seen everywhere in the anarchy that has resulted from the unbridled individualism that has come to dominate British life — an anarchy which many Conservatives abhor but which is the direct product of doctrines their party has adopted.

Could there be a better argument in favour of this paper's long-standing advocacy of new principles of authority in the nation, reaching right up to the topmost level of the state, putting an end to the self-defeating free-for-all we live under at the moment, and permitting the supervision of national resources in such a way as to make Britain once more an efficient and harmoniously functioning nation geared to a common purpose?

Who knows? At the end of it all the trains might even run on time!

DESPITE SILENCE AND CENSORSHIP

Exploding violence signals collapse of multi-racialism in Britain

THE multi-racial experiment rammed down the throats of the British people for so many years is now in the throes of complete collapse, however hard the nation's rulers may try to hide the fact by lies and censorship. This is plain from the racial violence exploding from one end of the country to the other.

In the last three months alone a sampling of local newspaper reports shows ordinary British folk suffering outrage after outrage.

In Halifax (Yorks.) a series of attacks, described by police as particularly vicious and unprovoked, was carried out seemingly at random against local Whites by Asian immigrant gangs. A string of assaults with iron bars, bottles and other weapons took place in the small hours of a Sunday morning early in September. Five white men, sitting peacefully in a taxi cab office waiting for transport home were set upon out of the blue by a gang of 8-10 immigrants, hit to the ground with flails and clubs and kicked whilst down.

Minutes later, two other Whites walking down the street minding their own business were jumped by a car-load of armed Asians. Another man walking in the same immigrant-filled district of this supposedly British town was assaulted and robbed by Asians a day or two later.

There was speculation that Asian youths might be in the business of using violence to mark out the area around Gibbet Street, the scene of the attacks, as in some way their own tribal territory. One Asian youth leader, Altaf Hussain, demanded that more public funds be given to the local Islamic community.

CHILDREN TERRORISED

Meanwhile, in Oldham (Lancs.) in October a group of young schoolchildren were terrorised at a local community centre in the town's racially tense Glodwick district by a mob of 70 Asian thugs. The children, who were members of an under-12 soccer team, had just started a practice kickabout on a football pitch when their team manager, Mr. Alan Sutcliffe, was suddenly grabbed around the throat by one of the thugs. The children were instantly surrounded by gangs of Asians.

Mr. Sutcliffe told them to run to their van for safety as missiles were thrown at them. "The children were screaming and crying," he said. "Bricks were coming from all directions. They even tried to block the road but we managed to escape. As far as I am concerned it was a racial attack. The crowd kept calling us 'white bastards.' "

The attack was the second in the area in three days believed by police to be racially motivated.

WHITES HIT BACK

Meanwhile, where Whites now see their areas infiltrated rapidly by large numbers of immigrants they have felt driven to take hard-nosed action in what they see is a last-ditch effort to prevent an alien takeover.

In the Kates Hill estate of Dudley (West Midlands) fighting has broken out between local white youths and Pakistani immigrants. The situation has been much aggravated by the arrogance of some of the immigrants in putting armed gangs of self-appointed 'vigilantes' on the local streets.

Similarly, in Holborn (North London) the local Regents Park Estate has become a hotbed of racial tension. Much of the fault lies with Camden Council, which over the last few years has deliberately packed this one-time white working class district with Bangladeshi immigrants. This alien influx has been backed up with big dollops of money by the Labour authority, run by typical left-wingers. Whilst local British folk have been left to stew, council grants have gone to causes such as the local 'Bengali Workers' Action Group', which exists to agitate for more special rights and privileges for the newcomers.

Meanwhile, inevitably in these conditions, inter-racial hostilities have broken out as the local Whites, who hold themselves rigidly aloof from what they see as alien intruders forced upon them, have acted sometimes violently to defend their neighbourhood. Encouraged by the attitude of the kind of often well-heeled yuppies, trendies, homosexuals and 'ethnics' on the make who dominate the council, immigrant gangs have also carried out some very nasty racial attacks on Whites, using chains, knives and other weapons. Seemingly they, like their fellow Asians in Halifax, have been led to believe that by such means they can grab the area for themselves.

THINGS GETTING WORSE

Such attempts, however, are likely to collapse along with multi-racialism itself. The level of violence currently afflicting Britain, which simply gets worse with time as the races the races are more and more mixed together, shows what a non-starter the whole idea of a multi-racial Britain was from the beginning — much as nationalists have always predicted.

The examples quoted are in fact only the tip of an iceberg. Our politicians and news media, as a matter of policy, barely mention what is happening. With their simpering slogans of 'racial harmony' and their pretence that everything in the multi-racial garden is lovely they are as much at odds with reality as the pre-glasnost Soviet bureaucrats who tried to hide the collapse of their national economy from the Russian public.

Our own rulers' conspiracy of silence will in the end be just as ineffective in saving their system. Truth will out. The British are no more total fools than are the Russians. Multi-racialism is as doomed as Soviet Communism.

WHITE BACKLASH SHAKES EUROPE

FACED with the threat of an imminent flood of Afro-Asian immigrants, Whites are now stirring themselves to revolt from one end of Europe to the other.

First to move have been the French. During the 1980s the courageous and determined leader of France's patriotic Front National, M. Jean-Marie Le Pen, sent forth his clarion call to his fellow countrymen to stand and fight to preserve their land from the rising tide of colour that was threatening to drown it.

Millions responded by voting for him. In 1988 Le Pen won over 4 million votes as a candidate for the presidency of the republic. He described this as an earthquake which had changed the face of French politics.

Such is the people's mood of hostility to the racial ruination they now see as about to engulf them that no less a personage than conservative ex-President Valéry Giscard D'Estaing, who wants his old job back when it comes up for re-election in 1995, has felt bound to change his tune if he wants to keep in with the voters. Recently he has stated that French nationality should be a "right of blood" rather than a "right of ground" — a matter of race and ancestry rather than place of birth.

GERMAN UPRISING

Tremors are now also starting to hit Germany's smug, alien-loving 'liberal' establishment in Bonn. Ordinary Germans do not feel that the newly united country for which they have waited for so long should be turned into a province of the Third World.

The Bonn régime promised the people of the East, who had suffered so long and so harshly under the Soviet yoke, their freedom. But, apart from a deep recession and mass unemployment, all those people seem to be getting, along with the rest of the country, is Afro-Asian immigrants.

In Hoyerswerda, Saxony, formerly part of the Soviet zone, there was an explosion of popular rage only recently when the authorities dumped a group of African and other immigrants on the already depressed community. The newcomers, who brought noise, dirt and disorder with them, had been given welfare, housing and other benefits seen as rightfully belonging to the native Germans.

When youths identified with patriotic movements acted forcefully to evict the immigrants from the town the local people applauded them. Other smaller incidents were reported elsewhere in the East.

Meanwhile, in the West, a more measured political response has registered itself. Prompted by the flood of phony 'asylum' seekers, mainly from the Third World, exploiting Germany's feeble and permissive refugee laws — which practically give instant housing and welfare to all comers — voters, especially the young, supported the patriotic German People's Union (DVU) en masse in local elections in Bremen. By energetic campaigning, and being in tune with true popular feeling, the DVU forced the race issue to centre stage and got a number of its candidates elected to the parliament of the city-state. Partly because of this, the pro-alien Social Democratic Party (SPD) — the equivalent of Labour in Britain — lost its long-standing control of the state.

In other countries, too, the same feeling is starting to spread. Belgium, Italy and Sweden, all similarly under threat from Third World mass immigration, have also seen nationalist successes at the polls.

Not surprisingly, signs of the new awakening are at last showing themselves here in Britain. The racial situation in this country is as grave as in any of the others, and a mood of popular resistance is growing.

As Tory journalist Paul Johnson put it recently: "The feeling that immigration is out of control is deeply linked in the minds of many with a doubled crime rate and the new propensity of cities to explode in riots."

This may be why, in August, the people of Bermondsey, South London, courage-

MAJOR GROVELS TO GET BLACK VOTE

PRIME MINISTER John Major has not been slow to realise the growing importance of the black vote in British elections. One of the moves to attract the votes of the country's Blacks away from Labour was the adoption of West Indian John Taylor as prospective Tory candidate for Cheltenham. But Mr. Major has not stopped there.

A further ploy to curry favour with the black community was an article the Premier recently wrote for Black Briton, a weekly newspaper catering for that community, in which he spoke in gushing terms of the "debt of gratitude" that Britain owed to Afro-Caribbeans. It was convenient that this article did not appear in the papers normally read by white people, for if it had done it might have shown just how far Mr. Major is prepared to go to ingratiate himself with the country's Blacks.

Said the Premier in one paragraph:-

> "I am encouraged by how much, in a free Britain, black people are already contributing. More black people are finding success in business and the arts — although I would be the first to admit that more progress needs to be made."

The reference to "free Britain" will be interesting news to nationalists who find themselves deprived of their rights of assembly. However, we might pass that over and contemplate the assertion that black people are finding success in business. If they are, we haven't yet heard of it. As for success in the arts, just about anyone can achieve that today if they supply the kind of 'artistic' productions that are called for and promoted by the left-wing 'art' trendies who control the BBC, the Arts Council and other such public bodies.

Mr. Major goes on in the following paragraph to demonstrate what 'arts' he has in mind when he speaks of "soul and rock music." The success of black people in these fields, he says, "must be an inspiration to others and may ultimately do more than anything else to demonstrate the utter foolishness of discrimination." He then went on to conclude:-

> "Times are changing. Already more than half of British people of Afro-Caribbean origin were born here. You are an essential part of our culture and our national life. While there is still some way to go in achieving the spread of opportunity for which I seek, the trends are encouraging. As Prime Minister, I will do my utmost to make sure that the future for black people in Britain is both prosperous and harmonious."

The real reasons for this fawning tribute from Mr. Major were in fact provided in a leader which appeared on the very same page as his article. This leader was arrogantly headed 'We've got the power', and it consisted of a reminder to readers (and perhaps to politicians who cared to study such publications) of the increasing political muscle now being wielded by black people in Britain. The leader said:-

> "Members of parliament are constantly reminded of the strides our race has made in this country by the outspokenness of Bernie Grant and the promotion of Paul Boateng to front bench status.
> "So it is that we see a Prime Minister, for the first time, directly addressing the black population.
> "Some may regard this as a cynical gesture, given only as a pre-election publicity boost (too right! BN). However, it is in itself a sign of how much progress we have made...
> "In the next election, black people could play a crucial role. Many of the most marginal constituencies are in areas with large black populations, so we have the power to swing several seats."

BN readers will see in this passage, only very thinly veiled, an indication of the contempt that the writer obviously feels for Britain's Prime Minister, whom he clearly recognises as trying to buy electoral support. At the same time he is only too glad that our country has been afflicted with such an abject creature as its 'leader', as it admirably serves the interests of the black community to have the likes of Major in office.

Major knows what the editor of Black Briton also knows: that the politicians of both the main Westminster parties have, between them, created a situation in which, to stand a chance of holding office, they must now 'buy off' Britain's Blacks with flattery and favours. In the words with which the editorial concludes: "...we must let them know in no uncertain terms that now, unlike ever before, we have the power to change the running of the country."

THE TELL-TALE NEWSPAPER EXCERPTS

Above are the front page and page 6 of* Black Briton, *the quaintly named paper which purports to serve the Afro-Caribbean community in this country. From these it will be seen that Prime Minister Major has been busily occupied kowtowing to Britain's Blacks — no doubt with an eye to the increasing importance of the black vote at the next election (see leader headed 'We've got the power').

Black Briton COMMENT

We've got the power

Much has been said on the subject of politics over the last few weeks. The plethora of party conferences, election hype and the usual mud-slinging has left many in a total quandary as to where to place their vote. And we as Black people are no different. We are all only too aware how politicians have broken their promises and turned full circle when the political going has got tough.

But this election could, just, prove a little different. While politicians have treated Black people with disregard in the past, they are now becoming aware of Black people's growing influence in this country. In the House itself, Members of Parliament are constantly reminded of the strides our race has made in this country, by the outspokenness of Bernie Grant and the promotion of Paul Boateng to front bench status.

So it is that we see a Prime Minister, for the first time, directly addressing the Black population.

Some may regard this as a cynical gesture, given only as a pre-election publicity boost. However, it is in itself a sign of how much progress we have made. A few years ago, politicians wouldn't have even thought we were worth wasting breath over.

In the next election, Black people could play a crucial role. Many of the most marginal constituencies are in areas with large Black populations, so we have the power to swing several seats.

While we may not always like what the politicians set out for us, it is crucial that we hold them to account. We must all make sure that we listen to the politician's words, and we must let them know in no uncertain terms that now, unlike ever before, we have the power to change the running of the country.

FLEXING THEIR MUSCLES

Above is a reprint of part of the leader column of* Black Briton. *It explains why Major is so anxious to win favour among the immigrant community.

Excellent Lanarkshire meeting

LARKHALL (Lanarkshire) was the scene of an excellent meeting in November which marked the latest of the British National Party's recruiting drives in Scotland. About sixty people were in attendance, most of these local. The success of this meeting provides just one more indication of the huge potential the BNP is showing north of the border. This potential was acknowledged by the party's opponents when they staged their 'anti-racist' march through Glasgow on November 30th — reported elsewhere in this issue.

They banned Leuchter — so why not Sharpton?

Beat this, if you can, for double-standards.

Fred Leuchter is an American engineer specialising in the design of systems for the purpose of execution by means of lethal gas, used in some states in the USA. Mr. Leuchter is white.

A short while ago he was commissioned to make a visit to the site of the former Auschwitz concentration camp for the purpose of examining the installations allegedly used as 'gas chambers' there. His brief was to inspect these installations to see whether in fact they could have been used to kill people by gassing, as claimed by many historians, and to report on his findings. This he did, and the findings were later published in a document known as the Leuchter Report.

THE 'REV' AL SHARPTON Seen here with another troublemaker, Bernie Grant, on his last visit to Britain.

Mr. Leuchter was invited to come to Britain last month to address an audience at Chelsea Town Hall on the subject of his report. As soon as his coming was known, the Home Office ruled that he should be denied admission to the UK on the grounds that his presence here was "not conducive to the public good."

Mr. Leuchter is a respectable citizen of his country. He has never been convicted for any criminal offence. His findings on the Auschwitz 'gas chambers' are doubtless controversial, but if our democratic traditions mean anything he should be entitled to a hearing on the matter and his audience allowed to make up their own minds.

Nonetheless, the Home Office decided to ban him from entry.

Believing this ban to be undemocratic and wrong, friends of Leuchter contrived to get him into the country by the back door, and he did in fact make it to the meeting.

But he had been speaking for no more than ten minutes when police arrived and arrested him. He was subsequently deported to the United States.

Now contrast this case with another one.

The Rev. Al Sharpton is black. He has over several years established for himself a notorious reputation in the US as a public agitator and troublemaker, and ... s been imprisoned for his part ... inciting acts of public disorder.

Last April he was let into Britain — despite the fact that he had announced in advance that he intended visiting well-known trouble-spots of racial disorder, including Brixton, Tottenham and St. Pauls, Bristol. Once here, he immediately put himself at the head of a march through South London which ended in a near-riot when some of his followers threw missiles at the British National Party Bookshop in Welling. A few days later he was involved in a meeting which ended in further disorder in central London. Yet he was not deported but allowed to continue his tour of this country undisturbed before going home.

It was then announced that he was due to make another visit last month, during which he would be visiting the Ely district of Cardiff, scene of some vicious rioting earlier in the year. Once again, the Home Office made no attempt to stop him entering, and he carried out his itinerary as planned.

Why the ban on Fred Leuchter but no ban on Al Sharpton?

People aware of these inconsistencies in Home Office behaviour will find it hard not to draw the conclusion that, not for the first time, our Government has shirked applying the law properly and impartially because of fear of upsetting Britain's ethnic minorities.

Because, as a report elsewhere on this page makes clear, the Rev. Sharpton's kinfolk in Britain have a lot of votes. The Government doesn't want to pass up the chance of winning some of them in the coming general election.

So, as we have so often seen before, it is a case of one law for Blacks and another for Whites!

Police being made powerless in the face of growing disorder

BRITAIN is falling apart.

The riots of recent months have shown how far the authorities in this country have now allowed vast and growing areas to become 'no-go' for our police. Law and order in such areas can be enforced, if at all, only with great difficulty.

Police themselves are now regular targets for attack. In many places they live on tenterhooks, not knowing whether they can even make an arrest without sparking a riot.

For this, in very large part, they have to thank their political masters who lost them the psychological battle against the violent inner-city criminal element back in the 1980s.

According to London Evening Standard crime correspondent Roger Graef, many ordinary police officers now feel "a sense of hopelessness," in particular about the soft methods imposed on them under the terms of the Scarman Report, compiled on the orders of the Government after the Brixton riots of 1981.

Lord Scarman professed to believe that thenceforth black criminals in particular — whom he designated as poor, put-upon victims of 'racist' British society — should be handled with special kid gloves. That way, he maintained, things would settle down, Blacks would spontaneously accept Britain's system of law and order if police were nice to them, and all would be love and kisses.

The opposite has of course been the case. Our police are still hated by these elements. But the pussyfooting régime imposed upon them by the Government's adoption of Scarman's recommendations has caused them, in addition, to be despised as weak by the thug and the rioter, who, in turn, filled with a sense that they now have some sort of divine right to break our laws, have lost any sort of inhibitions about attacking them.

GUTLESSNESS

The kind of atmosphere this has bred in the police hierarchy has, in the view of many rank-and-file bobbies, put a premium on gutlessness among their superiors. Says Graef, speaking of September's riot in Oxford: "Officers in sensitive areas like Blackbird Leys kept a low profile and overlooked offences rather than risk an arrest blowing up into something more. To PCs and sergeants outraged by ignoring crime, this is not discretion to keep the peace, but cowardice in ambitious middle-ranking officers afraid to take a decision."

In other words, things have now got to the point where police are in a vicious circle. On the orders of their superiors they increasingly have to ignore crime to prevent worse trouble. Their superiors themselves are in turn afraid to act because, given the Scarman-imposed weakness of the force, and the equally Scarman-engendered aggression of the criminal, there might be further aggravation if they did. This would displease their political masters and those

Exposed — the great Euro-swindle

NOW IS THE TIME TO STOP PRETENDING THERE IS ANY FUTURE IN THE COMMUNITY AND TO BEGIN THE FIGHT FOR BRITISH INDEPENDENCE

RIGHT from the moment when it began publication ten years ago, our paper has been implacably opposed to British membership of the 'European Community', the now fashionable name for what used to be known as the Common Market.

Over the past decade we have been consistent in this opposition — for much of the time in the face of great public apathy: large numbers of British people, while scarcely enthusiastic about membership of Europe, have accepted it in the belief — nurtured assiduously by the politicians and mass media — that Britain cannot survive outside the Community. In addition to this, people in our country have not been confronted — as they have been in the case of immigration — with visible evidence of the harm resulting from government policy. They have not felt personally affected by what has been happening — even though, in the case of a great many, job opportunities have been disastrously reduced by the huge volume of imports that Britain takes in from Europe — not matched by comparable British exports to Europe.

Perhaps the major reason for public apathy over Europe has been that the politicians, right from the beginning, have never been honest with the people about the ultimate objectives involved in British membership of the Community.

In a referendum in 1975 the people voted in a majority to stay in the EC. They did so for four main reasons:-

(1) The mass media, which played the main part in shaping public opinion, were overwhelmingly in support of membership.

(2) Largely by way of persuasion by the media, the people believed that Britain would derive great economic benefits from being in Europe.

(3) Likewise, the people were also persuaded that Britain could not survive outside Europe, that there was no alternative to going in and staying in.

(4) Perhaps most important of all, the people were hoodwinked into thinking that the European Community was going to be just an economic association and that it was not intended that it should ever become integrated politically. The politicians and media at the time assured us that Britain would not lose any national sovereignty. This was a downright lie, but the majority believed it.

NEW SITUATION

During the past year or two all this has dramatically changed.

Now, nearly 19 years after Britain entered the Community, there has been ample time for people to assess the economic benefits. There have been a few such benefits but there have been far greater losses. Foreign traders have made much greater inroads into the British market than British traders have into the European market.

EURO-PALS
Mrs. Thatcher hob-nobs with President Mitterand (above) and Chancellor Kohl (right). For years, as Premier, she tried to deceive herself and the country that Britain had a future in Europe. Now she finds the chickens coming home to roost

The argument that Britain could not survive outside the European Community was always fallacious. Far smaller and weaker nations than we have been able to survive outside the EC and prosper: Norway, Sweden and Switzerland, for example.

One part of this argument about Britain not being able to survive outside Europe was the claim that we had to go in because we had lost our Empire and needed a large economic area to replace it.

In fact, the truth was rather the reverse. The truly valuable parts of the Empire — the White Dominions — had become alienated from Britain largely because of the latter's commitment to Europe and its consequent abandonment of its old cousins and partners. Rather than the latter leaving us, it was very much a case of our leaving them!

But the biggest reason why public opinion has of late swung dramatically away from sympathy with the European Community is that what the politicians and media previously denied cannot seriously be denied any longer: it is intended that Europe will not stop at merely being an area of economic co-operation but will evolve into a full-scale political union — a union in which the national sovereignty and freedom for which millions of Britons of many generations have died will be surrendered. All the present developments within the Community make that clear.

And the more the British people are awakening to this the less they like it!

This has put the politicians of the present Government into a flat spin. Inwardly, they are committed to the policy of surrender of British sovereignty, but outwardly they dare not admit it — for they know that if they do they stand to lose a great many votes.

As a result, they have been engaging in a series of contortions and acrobatics, facing first one way then another — on Monday making firm declarations of their commitment to Europe so as to please the Community and the powerful interests in Britain that support it, then on Tuesday reassuring the electorate at home of their resolve not to sell Britain down the river!

PROTESTORS

Now, late in the day, two influential figures in Britain have started to express alarm at the way Government policy is heading. They are the former Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher and her ex-Cabinet colleague Norman Tebbit. Both have made public statements demanding a referendum on the question of Britain's acceptance of a single European currency, and both have drawn a great deal of flak from the present Government for doing so.

For the very last thing the Government wants is a referendum; it wants to railroad us all into a single currency and, after that, into full political union without the British people being able to have any say in the matter.

To support its refusal of a referendum the Government has employed an argument that does not hold water for a single second.

Mr. Major, speaking on its behalf, has said that the proper democratic and constitutional procedure is for parliament to decide such matters. As the people have elected parliament, so the argument goes, parliament can claim to speak and act for the people.

And if the people do not like what parliament is doing over Europe they can vote against the politicians responsible in the general election of 1992.

It all sounds very fine, doesn't it?

But for just two things. In the first place, just what choice do the people have in the coming general election if all the main parties in that election — the parties, that is, that have a chance of winning a national majority and forming a government — are committed to the same policy over Europe?

Secondly, even if one of the parties — the Tories, for instance — gave an electoral pledge not to surrender British sovereignty to Europe, either in the way of agreeing to a single currency or in the way of any other concessions that would involve the transfer of powers from Britain to the Continent, just what guarantee do the British people have that they would keep their word? The whole record of the politicians of both the leading parties, Tory and Labour, in taking Britain further towards incorporation into Europe is one of telling the people one thing and then doing something entirely different.

DISHONESTY

Remember, as we have said, when they first took us in in 1973 they promised that the EC would be simply an economic association, not a political union. They told us then that we would not lose "any essential sovereignty" (Prime Minister Heath's words in 1971, two years before Britain joined).

That was a lie.

Now listen to what Mr. Major says about Britain joining a common European currency. In a recent speech at the Lord Mayor's Banquet at London's Guildhall he said that he did not see Britain joining a common European currency now but he did not rule out such a thing in the future. That is rather cleverer than a lie; it is a keeping open of two options: the first to enable him to win the next election, the second to keep the door open to the policy that is his ultimate objective.

Such a two-way proposition is in fact nonsense. The commitment of Britain to a single European currency is not something that can be wrong one moment and then right the next; if it is wrong now it will always be wrong. Mr. Major knows it. The members of his Government know it. We know it. Intelligent and perceptive people in Britain know it, and are not fooled.

But Mr. Major's hope is that the millions who constitute the main body of the British electorate will be fooled. So in realty such language represents just as great dishonesty as a downright lie in which the Prime Minister promised not to join a single currency while he had every intention of doing so.

And so it has been with all the rhetoric over Europe that has emanated from the mouths of the politicians during the past two decades.

ELECTION COMES FIRST

On this matter, some of the politicians have well and truly laid their souls bare during the past month.

Sir Norman Fowler, in reaction to Mrs. Thatcher's call for a referendum on the single currency, said: "It makes me angry. What I say to Mrs. Thatcher is that if she goes on like this she is going to lose us the election."

Mr. Kenneth Clarke spoke in similar vein, saying of Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Tebbit: "I thought Margaret and Norman wanted us to win the next election..."

Here we have a decision which could result in the throwing away of more than a thousand years of British freedom, which could render in vain all the sacrifices of our war heroes who defended Britain against would-be Continental conquerors, and the most important thing these two Tory bigwigs can think of is the outcome of the next election. What a commentary on the politicians' scale of priorities!

Of course, what Sir Norman and Mr. Clarke are really saying is: "To win the next election, we need to keep the European controversy under wraps. If the voters start really thinking seriously about it and asking awkward questions, that would be most embarrassing. We want them simply to give us another mandate so that we can then get on with carrying out our European policies while being able to say at the same time that we are acting on behalf of the people — for, after all, they voted for us, didn't they?''

TEBBIT
Shown here in thoughtful mood, maybe he is at last regretting all the crusading he has done for Europe

SINNERS THAT REPENTETH

Welcome though the voices of Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Tebbit are to the ranks of opposition to European Union, we must not forget that these two politicians when in government willingly allowed themselves to be party to the process of increasing British ensnarement in the European Community. It was Mrs. Thatcher who, when Prime Minister, gave the signature of the British Government to the Single European Act, having voted for it when it was moved through the House of Commons — as Mr. did Tebbit also. Both these two, to this day, stress that they are in favour of Britain's membership of the Community and that they see no future for our country outside Europe. Opponents of Mrs. Thatcher's recent referendum call have also reminded us, quite correctly, that she opposed the decision of parliament to call the previous referendum on British EC membership in 1975.

From this it may be seen that both parliamentarians have been rather late in the day in waking up (if that is the right word) to the dangers of present Government policies on Europe, and that their opposition, such as it is, is somewhat half-baked: they still want Britain to be tied to the European economic system and rules, which render it impossible for us to take unilateral measures to protect our own domestic industries as they fall, one by one, to the onslaught of imports from the Continent. They are still committed to support of the Common Agricultural Policy (CAP), that piece of insanity by which prices of food in Britain are kept well above international market costs in order to sustain inefficient Continental farmers. Both have accepted the coming of the Single European Market, due to take effect next year, under which all remaining national barriers against trade within Europe will be swept aside, leaving British industry even more vulnerable to the import invasion than in the past.

Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Tebbit are, therefore, not exactly people with the highest credentials in the way of British opposition to Europe. If they are starting to see the dangers of full integration now, it prompts the question: why did they not fully recognise those dangers in the past, and fight a full-blooded battle against them? And why did they not recognise right from the beginning, as we did, that Europe was always intended by its pioneers and controllers to culminate in political union and that, therefore, endorsement of part of the scheme but not the whole of it was a nonsense, a non-starter?

THE INEVITABLE OUTCOME

Whatever the shrill voices of protest from Mrs. Thatcher and Mr. Tebbit, the Government will not now be stopped in its flat-out drive to frog-march Britain into a single European currency and full-scale political union. Whether or not the union is described officially by the word 'federal' — an issue of much current argument between the Government and its European pals — is neither here nor there; it will amount to the same thing. Whether the locking of the pound into the single currency comes about in the short term or the long term, it will come — because the Government is set on it; it just remains for the latter to decide the most opportune moment, and that will be the moment when it judges British public opinion to be sufficiently lulled to sleep for it not to know what is happening.

Likewise, it is improbable in the extreme that the Government — or a Labour Government if Mr. Major loses the election next year — will consent to a referendum on thes sues.

If the British people vote Tory in 1992, or if they vote Labour, they will get the same thing where Europe is concerned.

And if they vote Liberal Democrat it will be no different either. Paddy Ashdown & Co. are as heavily committed to full European integration as either of the other two — in fact Paddy's only criticism of the others is that they're not going fast enough or far enough in that direction!

So the electoral game simply amounts to this: Heads the European integrators win, tails the believers in British sovereignty lose. That is 'democracy' as we have it in the 1990s.

WHAT WE MUST NOW DO

British sovereignty and freedom are not lost for ever. What is done by the politicians of today can be undone by the politicians of tomorrow.

They may padlock us into Europe, with all our effective powers of self-government taken away; we can break that padlock and regain our power to govern ourselves if we are determined upon it and if we organise ourselves properly for the purpose.

If we are to be properly organised, the first thing we must do is fully understand the issues at stake and the options confronting us. Of these options there are in fact only two:-

(1) We stay in the European Community and accept its programme of advancement towards full political and monetary union.

(2) We leave the Community and declare for British independence in the very fullest sense of the term.

There is no middle way; it is either one or the other.

Having got properly straight what the options are, we must of course decide on the second option.

Then, having done that, we must embark on a firm strategy whereby such an objective can be achieved. Here again we must rid ourselves of certain popular illusions.

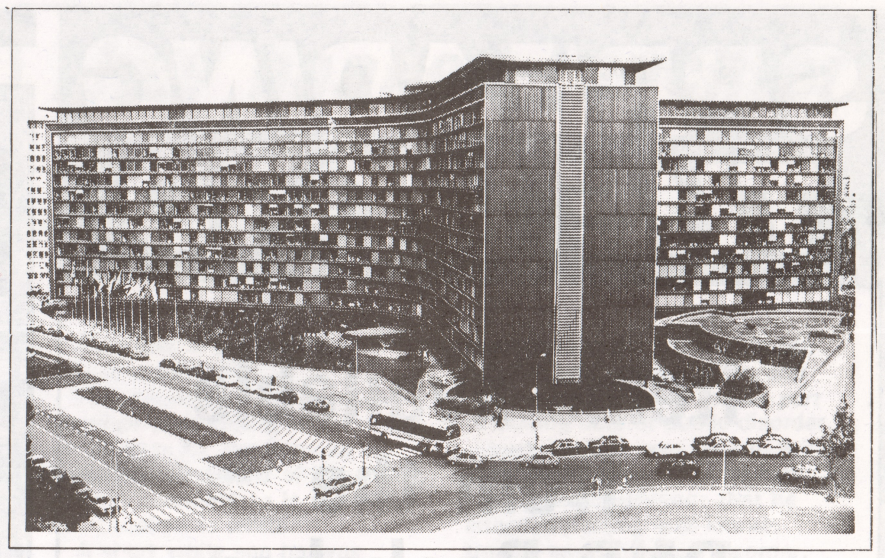
British freedom from Europe is not going to be achieved by means of support of any of the parties currently holding seats in Westminster — or even any dissident factions within those parties. The parties as they are are irrevocably committed to Europe. As for such dissident factions as may exist within them, these are too weak, too fragmented and too compromised. Ask a hundred of the people who comprise them and they will give you a hundred different answers as to what they see as alternatives to present policy. Only a tiny minority among them accepts the necessity for full withdrawal from the EC; most of them hanker after some kind of 'halfway house' between withdrawal and full union — a halfway house that is a pure phantom and not acceptable to the rest of Europe anyway.

These considerations aside, the factions and pressure groups within the Westminster parties that have campaigned against full union over all these many years are distinguished by one thing; they have all failed miserably. The Bruges Group is just one example, the latest among many.

There remains the only feasible strategy: a new political movement entirely outside and separate from the current parties of Westminster must be created and built up so that sometime before the end of this century, or very shortly afterwards, it can challenge for political power and oust the parties of treason and betrayal once and for all!

The job of creating that movement has already been carried out. Such a party exists. It is the British National Party. All that remains is the task of building it up so that it can mount the challenge to the other parties that is needed.

Those who oppose Euro-Union must make the decision — soon — to give this party the support necessary to make it a power in the land. Otherwise they will deserve everything the Eurocrats have in store for them!



WHERE THE ENEMY WORKS
Headquarters of the European Commission in Brussels

British house-buyers subsidise Third World

BRITISH HOUSE-BUYERS, as they groan under the crippling weight of interest on their mortgage repayments, have in the past been consoled by the Government by the assurance that these interest rates cannot be avoided if Britain is to win the fight against inflation. When 36,000 houses were repossessed during the first half of this year as a result of the mortgagees' inability to keep up their payments, doubtless Government representatives were on hand to soothe them with the message that, much though it (the Government) regretted their unhappy plight, it really could not do anything about it — economic affairs had got beyond its control!

Well, those unfortunate people may be interested to know what was recently admitted by the National Westminster Bank, Britain's second biggest. The bank last year had to write off no less than $1.43 billion, most of which was Third World debt. Yet it still managed to make a profit for the year of £400 million. How was this achieved? According to the bank: ''Almost all the profit came from domestic banking, which had a strong year... pushing up mortgage lending to £5 billion.''

So now we know! The huge profits that were still possible after all that Third World debt had been written off were provided by the British house-buyers through their massive interest payments. No doubt part of these profits also came from disposal of the houses which the 36,000 payment defaulters had had to vacate after they fell unacceptably in arrears.

MONUMENT TO MAMMON
The Natwest building towers over the London landscape. The bank pays for such structures, despite huge Third World debt write-offs, by soaking the British mortgagee.

So, dear reader, should you be one of those unlucky enough to get kicked out of your home in the near future because of your inability to meet your mortgage obligations, you do at least have this consolation: you can experience the warm glow that comes of feeling that you have helped pay for the upkeep of some African dictator's fleet of Rolls Royces or Mercedes. Think of that when the bailiffs knock on your door!

ously rose as one under British National Party leadership to push an insolent band of 'Black Power' marchers out of their clean white neighbourhood. It may also explain the higher votes the BNP has been getting in recent local elections.

Elsewhere in Europe the new racial patriotism is stirring to shake and challenge the corrupt multi-racialist order imposed upon us since 1945, and a similar trend can be seen in America with the rise of white leader David Duke. It is obviously in the interest of all our nations that the new spirit should prevail everywhere. Who knows? 'People Power' brought down the Soviet tyranny in the East. It may yet bring down the multi-racialist tyranny in the West!

PROOF POSITIVE!

AIDS not a problem for white heterosexuals

AIDS, the scourge of Africa and of queers everywhere, has been in Britain for around 10 years. Last month brought the disease back into the forefront of public prominence again with the death, through its ravages, of the pop singer Freddie Mercury. After the mass media had greeted the demise of this loathsome degenerate as if the musical world had lost some giant on a par with Caruso or Melba, a fresh impetus was given to the campaign to carry AIDS education into schools.

Anxious not to provoke a backlash against the queer fraternity, homosexuals in parliament, the media, the church and the civil service intensified their drive to 'prove' that AIDS could just as easily infect heterosexuals. As part of this, the case of a black American heterosexual sportsman who had contracted the disease was given special prominence. This followed the use by our own Government of a film-shot of an attractive white girl, who was shown as a typical heterosexual AIDS victim. Ignored in each case was the fact that the typical AIDS sufferer is homosexual.

At the beginning of this year queers everywhere jumped for joy as the cases of heterosexual HIV positive infection were shown to have risen.

But studies published later in the year turned the joy into gloom. The heterosexual AIDS cases were nearly all black — to be precise, African. In a clear parallel with the increase in the numbers of African 'political refugees' arriving in Britain, there has been a rise in the number of heterosexual AIDS cases.

The madness of unrestricted immigration of people from Africa posing as 'political refugees' — 1,000 a week from places like Uganda, where up to half of the population is HIV positive —is now fully revealed.

In St. Thomas's Hospital, Doctors Susan Mitchell and David Barlow said that the vast majority of heterosexuals they were finding HIV positive were either users of injecting drugs or Africans.

Guy's, St. Stephen's and Charing Cross Hospitals, all in London, and the Royal Berkshire Hospital in Reading have similar figures.

One doctor from Guys said that: ''seven out of eleven seropositive women are from Uganda, most of them being political refugees.'' Five of the women had lost their husbands in Uganda from AIDS. Two of the women have since had sex with Ugandan men in this country, raising the possibility of the virus spreading.

At St. Stephen's Hospital doctors reviewed 252 HIV cases. 167 were either homosexuals or intravenous drug users. Of the remaining 85, 51 had been born outside the UK and infected abroad. Only 34 were UK-born heterosexuals, and we were not told whether these were white or black.

This study is strikingly similar to studies in the US, where drug-users, homosexuals and black heterosexuals 90 per-cent of all AIDS cases (with these representing less than 20 per-cent of the population). At the present time it is not known to what degree UK-born Blacks are

FREDDIE MERCURY
Slept around with both sexes

YOUR LETTERS

Sir, — With reference to your article on Jenny Carney, the mother who managed to get her daughter removed to a less Asian school, you omitted to say that, although Mrs. Carney was white, her daughter was half-caste and the girl's father was black!

It seems that little Miss Carney's mother and father showed a bit of cheek in wanting her removed to a mainly white school. Probably, had they been an all-white family they would not have won their case!

A. SANDERSON
Meacham, Norfolk

Sir, — What a sickening symphony of 'tribute' we have seen from the media to the pop singer Freddie Mercury, who died of AIDS last month. The way Mercury's death, and the funeral following it, were built up into such a huge public 'hype' made me vomit.

What was Mercury but a filthy little degenerate, who quite possibly infected other people with his terminal disease before he finally succumbed to it himself? I am sure there are many millions who will shed no tears over his going.

L.E. WARREN
Skipton, Yorks.

Sir, — So Winston Silcott, Engin Raghip and Mark Braithwaite are 'innocent' of any involvement in the murder of PC Keith Blakelock! What this really means of course is that they cannot be any longer held as guilty under British law because the evidence used to convict them was flawed —that is another thing entirely from saying that they didn't do it. So it was of course with the IRA sympathisers who had their 'guilty' verdicts overturned a little earlier.

Of course, where there are genuine reasons for believing there have been miscarriages of justice the cases in question must be reviewed, but what is interesting about the Tottenham Three, the Guildford Four and the Birmingham Six is that in each instance politics were involved in the proceedings. There is a powerful and influential lobby in the mass media which supports the cause of the IRA as well as that of the Tottenham rioters. Were this not the case, and were the offences leading to the convictions ones of an ordinary criminal nature, would we have seen the highly orchestrated press and TV campaigns waged in sympathy with those sent to prison?

BNP in the South

HITTING A RAW NERVE

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY is now making headway everywhere across Britain, not just in London and the big cities. Even the sleepy South of England has started to come alive for the party, and the enemies of nationalism do not like it. Shown here is a recent hysterical squeal of fear and loathing from the local Fareham and Gosport Streetlife newspaper.

The appearance of party promotional material in Fareham, Hants., carrying a picture of an old lady shivering in a blanket in the depths of winter, and bearing the words: "She freezes in winter while the Third World gets a billion a year" caused one local Liberal Democrat to lose his marbles.

After stomping around Locks Heath area of the borough removing such material from public display, Mr. Bernard Brown furiously stormed off to his local rag to denounce the BNP for putting out the apparently disgraceful message that British people should be helped before aliens. By spreading such material around, Mr. Brown said, the BNP was inviting people to "become Nazis"!!!

The result? Shock! Horror! Headlines, and the party's name on the front page of the paper.

Perhaps Mr. Brown and his ilk are afraid of something, and who are we to say they're necessarily wrong?

The membership boom currently enjoyed by the BNP includes Fareham and Gosport. In addition, Southern Region activists have been busy recently in Southampton, Portsmouth, Basingstoke, Aldershot and Camberley – with excellent results.

Nazi scum's posters of hate

NAZIS are on the march in Fareham.

Extreme Right-wingers from the British Nationalist Party have posted leaflets in the town, urging people to join their ranks.

The leaflet depicts an old lady shivering in a blanket, with the words: "She freezes in winter while the Third World gets a billion a year."

By SEAN ASHCROFT

Under that, in bold red type, is the slogan: "Put our people before aliens."

A number of the leaflets were found pasted on lamp posts in the Sarisbury Green area.

The BNP is believed by experts to be cashing in on Fareham MP Peter Lloyd's position as Home Office Junior Minister for Immigration.

Local Liberal Democrat member Bernard Brown tore down half a dozen of the posters in the Locks Heath and Sarisbury Green areas.

Mr Brown said: "I was appalled when I saw these things on a number of lamp posts.

"As if Fareham wasn't Right-wing enough without people being invited to become Nazis."

Above is the report that appeared in* Streetlife. *So – if you think old folk in Britain have priority over the Third World, you're "Nazi scum" – or so the paper thinks!

Big Bermondsey drive

"VOTE STEVE TYLER" – That was the simple message that went out loud and clear to the people of Bermondsey, South London, on Saturday, the 30th November. A mass paper sale by sixty London activists at the 'Blue' Market on Southwark Park Road was the latest stage in Steve Tyler's campaign as the BNP's parliamentary candidate for Southwark and Bermondsey in the forthcoming general election.

Several dozen copies of British Nationalist were sold and thousands of leaflets were distributed to an enthusiastic public. Shoppers, mums with children, stallholders – everyone, it seemed – wished to shake Steve's hand and pledge their support. The activity was a resounding success that boosted the morale and the pride of the local white community. It was an activity which will be repeated over the winter months in all the constituencies which will have British National Party candidates at the election. The message is getting through to the public: "If you want to defend rights for Whites, then you must vote British National Party."

SPREADING THE MESSAGE Part of the BNP team, with Steve Tyler in centre

General Election: action stations!

Whenever the general election comes, the BNP will be ready. That's the message that has now gone out to activists and organisers throughout the country over the last few weeks.

The British National Party will contest at least 14 seats, with first class campaigns in all of them. Campaigning has already started, with warm-up leaflets being distributed in the many thousands throughout the country. If the election is held in the early summer of 1992 there is every possibility of more seats being contested.

The BNP will be fighting highly sophisticated and localised campaigns, with an individual personalised address for each constituency. This entails more work in the build-up, but it is only by localising our impact that we will have any relevance once the media election circus is whipped up.

All local units have been instructed to build up roots within their communities by campaigning on local 'Rights for Whites'-style issues.

This election is of major importance to the growth of the BNP. It is our first serious outing into parliamentary elections in which votes are being looked for as the top priority. The BNP is building up and growing in a controlled and steady manner. We will not try to overreach ourselves, but we will show that we can be successful in achieving our aims.

Local activities must be stepped up. More and more leaflets must be distributed. More and more papers must be sold. More and more local media publicity for our campaigns must be achieved. More and more money must be raised.

The BNP is now emerging onto the national scene as a real force in British politics. Do your bit to spread our success. Send in your donations to the BNP Election Fund – now!

ELECTION FUND

The BNP Election Fund currently stands at £1,589.40. This leaves £3,410.60 still to be raised to reach the fund's target of £5,000. Please send donations to: PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW.

infected, but there is a real possibility of infection spreading from Ugandan immigrants into the wider black population.

If nothing else, this study is good because it demolishes the myth that the ordinary white heterosexual person who keeps away from intravenous drugs and cohabits only with fellow-Whites has anything more than the tiniest chance of catching AIDS.

masters' senior appointees in the force itself, and might cost them their promotion.

Meanwhile, by the time things have got so far out of hand that police feel they have to act – as sometimes happens, as for example, against car thieves in Blackbird Leys, the police action that follows leads straight to a head-on clash with a criminal mob.

In this case the rioting went on for several days before police were able to get a grip on the situation. Some decent folk in the area finally felt in the end that it was down to them to do something for themselves. That was how courageous couple Melvin Davies and his fiancée Alison van Dyck came to be slashed and stabbed on their own doorstep by gangs, whom they had personally confronted after the latter had gathered in their street untroubled by police for the fourth night in a row.

In another of Britain's multi-racial hell-holes, the infamous red light district and drug-pusher's paradise of Chapeltown, Leeds, ordinary folk were left to fend entirely for themselves for hours on end when, back in July, hundreds of black youths went on a looting rampage. This was because the senior officer at the local police station seems to have feared that sending in his officers might 'provoke' the mob and spark an outright riot.

Things have come to the point where, as Roger Graef puts it: "Many police now feel isolated. Their superiors are against them as are the media and the community. The courts are ineffective, and even prison doesn't work. That leaves police holding the baby with a vengeance that emerges when they are finally allowed to go out and do something."

In the meantime, having landed this shambles of its own making in the lap of Britain's police, overstretched, underfunded and enfeebled by the Scarman-style directives it has itself imposed, the Government is totally bankrupt of ideas for restoring order to our country. It has no proposals to end the Scarman formula by giving police the power – not to say the order – to go in and crack a few of the right skulls when riots of this kind break out. Still less is there any sign that it means to abandon any of the policies that have helped ruin Britain's traditional national community – once the envy of the world for its law-abiding character.

GLASGOW

BNP again hits headlines, despite day of disruption

IN GLASGOW on Sunday, December 1st, the British National Party once again was the victim of the suppression tactics employed by Britain's 'democratic' state against dissident movements of the patriotic right.

On the previous day a mob of about 700 anti-BNP demonstrators had shuffled through the city in a protest against 'racism and fascism'. Some local BNP activists were present to heckle them and a few confrontations occurred. As a result of one of them, Scott McLean, one of the key BNP organisers, was arrested. Although the incident in which he had been involved was a very minor one and no-one had been hurt, he was held in police custody for the weekend and thus was not present to play his part in the BNP St. Andrew's Day Rally scheduled for the next day. The decision to detain him, instead of granting him bail as is normal in such cases, was clearly one made from high up, and was part of a policy, which became apparent the next day, of sabotaging the BNP rally. There is reason to believe that in the carrying out of this policy there was close collaboration between the senior heads of police and Strathclyde Council, which is one of the most viciously anti-BNP local authorities in Britain.

On the day of the BNP rally a much smaller opposition mob of about 100-120 gathered outside the pub in which party supporters had assembled as a rendezvous. No sooner had this become apparent than the police sealed off the entrances to the pub and obstructed further BNP supporters from entering and joining their colleagues. This clearly was part of a strategy to fragment the BNP ranks and prevent communication between the separated groups.

Those already in the pub were then detained there for a long time and prevented from proceeding to the place of the rally. The pretext given by the police was that if they were allowed to do so there would be a serious breach of the peace. In reply, BNP leaders assured the police that if they were allowed to link up with the colleagues from whom they had become separated and then to proceed as one group to the rally location no breach of the peace would occur — for the BNP contingent would practise discipline and restraint while their opponents would not dare attack them, knowing that they would come off worst in any skirmish.

The police refused to co-operate, and subsequently contacted the owners of the hall booked for the rally and pressured them to refuse the BNP admission.

After a long delay, the police then arranged the exit of the BNP supporters from the pub and their transportation by police vans to a location in another part of the city, where they were deposited. By now much time had been lost. This BNP contingent waited in another pub while attempts were made to find an alternative meeting room nearby and to locate the other groups of party supporters in the city with whom contact had been lost. In fact neither proved possible. In the end a short rally was held in a nearby park in the gathering dusk, which was addressed by John Tyndall, preceded by local leader Steve Cartwright, with Warren Bennett chairing.

Bearing in mind that the police placed no hindrance whatever to the anti-BNP demonstration on the previous day, there is no doubt that their brief from the very beginning had been to prevent the main BNP rally taking place and that this policy had been politically motivated rather than determined by considerations of 'public order'. In condemning the police collusion in this episode, we should make clear that it involved only officers at the most senior level; we do not blame the ordinary constables or sergeants on the spot, who were only carrying out the orders of their superiors, as obviously they had to do.

The good side to the day's events, as well as to those of the previous day, was that once again the BNP won massive publicity throughout Scotland, with prominent coverage in most of the newspapers and repeated mention on local TV and radio.

Whatever difficulties and barriers the authorities are placing in the way of the BNP in Scotland, these are not preventing its rapid growth there — nor will they deter the party's valiant corps of activists north of the border from carrying on the struggle!

Rebel vote sinks Gorby's plans

By MARK DOWDNEY

PRESIDENT Gorbachev's hopes of keeping the Soviet Union together have been dashed.

Millions of Ukrainians voted overwhelmingly for independence from the Kremlin.

They spurned the Soviet leader's warnings that to go it alone would cause disaster.

Although the result of the poll won't be announced until later today, early indications last night were of a massive yes for independence.

And it looks certain to doom Gorby's bid to turn the Soviet republics into a looser political and economic union.

The wealthy republic, known as the breadbasket of the union, looks certain to sever links with Russia — reaching back 1000 years.

And, for the 400 Ukrainians living in Scotland, independence will mean they will now be free to return home.

Many fled to Britain and Germany after World War II.

But Ivan Senkiw, secretary of the Ukrainian Community Centre in Edinburgh, warned:

"There is still a long way to go and already before all the problems are solved in our country.

"But at least we will be able to get our own passports and travel there freely if we want to."

PM plea to save last mill

WORKERS fighting to save a historic mill are to try to enlist Premier John Major's help.

About 320 jobs will be axed if Coats Viyella plan to close Paisley's last remaining cotton mill.

After a mass meeting of the Anchor Mill workforce yesterday, the town's MPs pledged to take their case to Mr. Major.

Paisley North MP Irene Adams said: "We believe there is a strong economic case for developing Anchor Mill.

"We will be putting that case to the company and the Prime Minister."

FESTIVE SHOPPERS FLEE RACE CLASH

10 arrests as terror hits a busy city street

By SANDRA DICK

SHOPPERS fled in terror as fighting broke out in one of Scotland's busiest streets yesterday.

Frightened Christmas shoppers and children fled for cover as anti-fascists and the Nazi-style British National Party clashed.

Police had to use their batons to split up fighting youths and protect themselves.

But the leader of the hate party, which preaches racism and anti-semitism, issued a menacing pledge.

John Tyndall, 57, said: "Our recruitment campaign in Scotland will go on. We will not give in.

"Scotland is our best recruitment ground.

"We have a better proportion of members in Scotland than anywhere else in the UK."

CHANTING

The violence flared as thousands of Christmas shoppers packed Glasgow's Argyle Street on the first full day of Santa Claus Land.

Women shoppers screamed in terror as an angry group of around 150 anti-fascists — some with their faces covered — laid seige to the Gallery Bar at Glasgow's Central Station.

That's where Tyndall and 30 of his supporters were meeting "in secret".

One leader of the demonstration, Lynn Henderson, said: "We're here to cause trouble, not to disrupt the meeting.

"These people have no place here and we want them out of Glasgow."

But, as chanting youths barricaded the two entrances to the pub, fighting broke out.

Startled shoppers and children had to be pulled aside as the angry mob spilled on to the busy road and others tried to force their way into the bar.

Around 50 police officers battled to keep order as fighting broke out and tried to bundle youths into police vans.

A police spokesman later confirmed there had been 10 arrests.

Tyndall and his supporters were taken through the back door and a tunnel to safety.

TV Anne's £2m baby campaign

ANNE Diamond is to spearhead a £2 million Government campaign to cut cot deaths.

She will front a TV advert to be shown before Christmas — just five months after finding her own baby, Sebastian, dead.

Anne has had secret meetings with Government health chiefs William Waldegrave and Virginia Bottomley.

Ministers were ashamed of the TV star Anne, 35, revealed they refused to appear on Every Mother's Nightwide campaign in New Zealand cut its own terrible toll by 80 per cent.

She said then: "I wanted to ask why British mothers were not given this information.

"If the Government has a good reason for not doing anything, let's hear it.

"I think we should have an advert on TV every night and the Government should fund it."

Shortly afterwards, the Government announced a £2m campaign and allowed their cot death safety guide for mums.

Prestwick sale nears

A DEAL to sell Prestwick Airport is about to be struck.

But final approval has still to be given by Prestwick's owners BAA — the old British Airports Authority.

It's thought British Aerospace are likely to take over the airport.

Ayrshire Tory MP George Younger — might then follow.

A spokesman for BAA plc said: "We are close to a conclusion or decision over the sale."

BNP subs due!

British National Party head office asks us to remind all readers who are also BNP members that their 1992 subscriptions will be due at the end of this month. It is most important that these are sent in promptly. Subs are still £12 a year (with 50 per-cent reductions for OAPs and students if desired).

What we stand for

- The establishment of a government of national unity that will put an end to nationally divisive party warfare; the return of leadership and statesmanship to British affairs.
- An end to immigration and a start to repatriation.
- British withdrawal from the Common Market
- The disbanding of the multi-racial Commonwealth and its replacement by a new Commonwealth of self-governing white states.
- British ownership and control of British industry and resources.
- Protection of British industry by the selective exclusion of foreign manufactured goods from the British market.
- An end to the financial swindle that causes inflation and slump, and its replacement by a sane and fair financial system that will give the people the purchasing power to buy the goods they produce.
- The subordination of the power of the City to the power of government, and the harnessing of the City to the needs of British industry.
- The regeneration of British farming, with the object of achieving the maximum possible self-sufficiency in food production.
- Rejection of both the poll tax and its substitute, the new 'property tax', and a return to the old rates system, though with fairer rebates allowing for differences in income and in the numbers occupying properties.
- A healthy environment for a healthy people — the protection of our countryside and an end to the architectural disfigurement of our towns and cities.
- Tougher treatment of criminals, including the return of the death penalty.
- A return to traditional methods of education, with stronger discipline in the classroom and the sacking of 'trendy' teachers.
- An alternative defence strategy: withdrawal from NATO, closure of all foreign military and air bases in Britain, the strengthening of Britain's defences and a position of armed neutrality.
- An end to overseas aid and the allocation of the money saved to the financing of repatriation and greater help for the needy at home.
- The crushing of the IRA, the termination of the Anglo-Irish Agreement and firm support for the loyalist majority in Northern Ireland.
- Repeal of the laws permitting homosexuality and abortion (except where the latter is the result of rape or necessary on medical grounds), the wiping out of AIDS and a return to healthy moral values aimed at strengthening the family and community.

THE WELLING CLUB?

THE BRITISH NATIONAL PARTY has reached a stage of its development at which there beckon to it enormous possibilities for growth and expansion. The problem at the moment is that for it to exploit these possibilities more money is needed. With membership increasing all the time, revenue from subscriptions and ordinary donations is increasing correspondingly. Most of this revenue, however, is consumed in the financing of the ordinary everyday expansion in the party's organisation. Little, if anything, is left to pay for the pioneering of new avenues of development which the party is anxious to pursue.

Recently, the party leadership has been exploring new ways to increase the party's revenue. As a result, the Welling Club has been formed.

The purpose of the Welling Club is to bring together a circle of party supporters who are in a position, and who wish, to contribute a regular sum of money to finance the party over and above that which is payable by ordinary member's subscription. If the party has such an additional source of income on which it can rely, it is much better placed to embark on expansion schemes than if it were to depend on ordinary irregular donations, which may or may not be forthcoming.

Membership of the Welling Club is open to those able and willing to guarantee a regular donation to the British National Party of £20 a month.

To be a member of the Welling Club, it is not necessary to be a card-carrying member of the British National Party.

In return for their £20 monthly contributions to the BNP, members of the Welling Club will receive regular bulletins containing important news of party development of a kind not normally reported publicly. In other words, they will be kept abreast of what the party is doing with the additional financial resources which their contributions will provide.

In addition to this, there will be a once-yearly dinner to which members of the Club will be invited free of charge, which will be addressed by the party Chairman.

Those who wish to become members of the Welling Club should write to: The Welling Club, PO Box 117, Welling, Kent DA16 3DW, enclosing their first monthly contribution of £20. To facilitate subsequent monthly contributions, a system of payment by banker's order is available. Details of this will be provided on receipt of applications and initial payments.

To give a lead to others, the Chairman of the BNP, Mr. John Tyndall, has enlisted as the first and founding member of the Welling Club. We hope that those who can follow this lead will promptly do so!
